the large interests would likely act in the way that the traders seem to think they act on all occasions. But when all the conditions that go to make a rising market, such as general prosperity and a fairly comfortable money situation, are there to help the holders of stocks, the large interests are not likely to show any precipitation in throwing over a part of their holdings merely because they get them cheap.

Money is coming into New York so fast, and the situation has besides been relieved so much by the liquidation in the stock market, that about the only concern now expressed is that corporation borrewing may be greatly increased on account of the ability of the railroad and other corporations to obtain funds on something like reasonable terms.
